In recent years, we've been called as educators and scientists to reflect on our commitment to social justice. For context, I trace the trajectory of my own individual change - from seeing justice activism work was separate from my STEM work to seeing them as inextricably linked. I then explore community-level views of change, from intentional community building efforts of support to detecting signals of critical transition in professional social networks and semantic networks from the archives of teaching materials.